Letter from the Staff

We hope you like the new Journal. As many of you know the Journal replaces Lost In Canada? which will no longer be published. Some articles began in Lost in Canada? will be continued in the Journal. With the chance to start out from scratch we intend to keep the popular from Lost in Canada? and attempt to compliment it with a few slight changes and some additions. Our newsletter Cousins et Cousines will go through a complete change. It will become what it was originally intended to be, "a newsletter." Sometimes you will receive the answer to your query from our query committee prior to it being published in the Journal, however, it will still be published in hopes that it will help someone else. During the delays that have occurred over the past couple of years a lot of queries have piled up. We will publish all we have in this issue without regard to the one free query per issue. We want to get you up to date. We are dropping the one query per issue rule, however, we reserve the right to hold extra queries until the next issue if space does not allow for the inclusion.

It is intended that both the Journal & the newsletter will be on 4 month cycles with one or the other being mailed about every 2 months (except to Canada where the two will be mailed together about every 4 months). We will do our best to meet these deadlines, however, there are some circumstances beyond our control that enter into delays that cannot be avoided. We will do our best to try to short circuit them before they have a chance to become a detriment. One big thing will be getting the Journal to the printers about 6 weeks before we intend to mail it. This will mean that queries will not necessarily be published in the next issue, because the next issue will be on the way to the printers not long after you have received your current issue. So it is important to get your queries in early.

Although you will receive 3 issues of the Journal each year we want you to be aware that your subscription pays for 4 issues per one year membership, which translates to a one year membership lasting about 16 months, and a two year membership lasting about 32 months. You should note that there will no longer be volume and issue numbers, instead each issue will have its own whole number, this is issue number 1, the next issue will be number 2, and so on, the numbering will not begin over. Your expiration label will read "EXPIRES WITH ISSUE #__". That number will be the last issue you have paid for. As in the past we will try to highlight your label when your membership has expired. We will also try to insert a slip inside the magazine as another reminder, however, there is no guarantee that the reminder slip will remain in the Journal through the mail.

Remember as a member, this is your publication, we would like to know what you think of it, what you like about it, how you think it can be improved, etc. Members are welcome and encouraged to submit original works to be considered for publication in the Journal. The publications committee will determine if and when an article should be included. If you submit an article, you will hear from us prior to your article being published. There are incentives for authors.

The most difficult issue to get ready for publication is usually the first. This issue was planned for mailing about 6 weeks prior to the date it will actually go out. We experienced the usual and also the unusual distractions which added to this slight delay in delivering this edition as we wished it to be. The current goal is to get the next issue out on schedule, which means it will be mailed in September. Look for the next issue of Cousins et Cousines in July.

Baptismal Records, 1835-1887, Kept At LaPointe & Bayfield, Indian Missions, By Iraneus Frederic BARAGA

The following records are extracted from the Parish records of the Indian Mission done by Father Iraneus Frederic BARAGA. All entries are were made by Father Iraneus Frederic BARAGA unless otherwise stated in the entry. Please remember to check each entry closely to make sure you do not overlook the individual you are searching for as many of the Indian names are very hard to read on the microfilm. The entries begin with the date 28 July 1835 & end with the date 15 Dec 1887. Records extracted from microfilm by John L. SCHADE. The records were microfilmed by State Historical Society of Wisconsin as "Baptismal Records of Father Baraga" & are on microfilm reel P82-2352. Marriage & burial records remain in the custody of the parish, HolyFamily at Bayfield, Wisconsin. It is a good idea to see what families participated during the visit of the priest, as relatives often came together.

NOTE: This is Part 5 - The first four parts appeared in the final four issues of Lost In Canada? & are available from NWTC&FHC.

Beginning Native American And Metis(se) Genealogical Research

by
 John L. Schade

Native American and Metis(se) genealogical and historical research does not have to be difficult. There are all kinds of records in the public domain that can be used to prove Native American families, the majority of which are used by all researchers. This article will only touch the tip of the iceberg on Indian research as there are many records in private collections. The fact that an individual may know very little about their family need not be a deterrent to anyone who really wants to learn about their family ancestry. They need only be persistent in searching and eventually they will find the record(s) needed to prove their family ancestry.

It is necessary to define two words to begin this article. The words are Genealogy and Research. The word Genealogy is that branch of history which involves the determination of family relationships. This is not done by copying but rather by research.¹ Genealogy is an account of the descent of a person, family, or group from an ancestor or from other forms.² Research is an investigation aimed at the discovery and the interpretation of facts and also the revision of accepted theories in the light of new facts.¹

As can be seen, the words genealogy and research have two different meanings. A good genealogy is completed by an individual doing their homework and research. A good genealogy is not created by copying another individuals work. A researcher needs to see the original records used as proof(s) of what the original researcher used to create their genealogy. How else can a researcher be sure that the previous researchers work is accurate?

Some of the first records a genealogist uses are certificates of birth, baptism, death, marriage and divorce. Following these are census records of the federal, state and territorial governments and other miscellaneous records.

The certificate of birth generally gives the name of the individual who was born, date of birth, and place of birth. The names of one or both parents is usually shown. When the name of only one parent is given, the certificate may be filed as an illegitimate birth. In some states only the person's named on such a certificate may purchase a copy of this certificate for privacy reasons, unless a court order is obtained to open the said certificate. The date that registration of births begin for each state is different. The certificate of birth can usually be found in the county of birth and for later years, in the state department of vital statistics. An individual must check with each individual state to find out when the state began keeping records of all births. When using an early certificate of birth, remember to check the name of the individual who reported the birth, if it was a parent, the certificate is usually more accurate. Be on the lookout for late filed birth certificates as well. If the filing of the birth was delayed check to see who the individual was who filed the said certificate.

At times certificates of birth were filed years after the birth by a midwife or another individual and they mistakenly reported the name(s) of one or both parents incorrectly. Alterations made to a certificate of birth should also show the source of the information used to correct a mistake on the certificate. Usually only a family member can file to have a certificate altered and the alterations may not always be accurate.

The certificate of death lists the name of the deceased individual, the date of death, place of death, and usually the date of birth, place of birth, names of parents, name of spouse, and whether single, married, or widowed at the time of death. There is a greater possibility of a mistake on a death certificate than on a certificate of birth as the individual may have moved completely across the United States and the people who are around at the time of death may not know anything about the persons background. A good example from the research on a man in Buchanan County, Iowa, follows. It was found that his daughter had given her father's grandmother's name instead of his mother's name. This error was easily caught because the correct names were already known from his baptismal record. If it had not already been known that the name was incorrect by looking at it, a search of records in Germany would have been futile since the search for the baptism would have been under the wrong mothers name. Any individual can give wrong information for a certificate of death, especially when they are grieving because of the loss of a loved one. Usually the name on a certificate of death is accurate, however you must always look to see who is giving the information for the certificate. Whether you recognize the name of the informant or not you should always double check the information given.

If the County and State Department of Vital Statistics do not have a record of the birth or death being searched for, it is very possible that the actual Indian Agency that covers the individuals tribe may have a record of the event even though it was never reported to the county or state.

A certificate of marriage is issued in conjunction with a marriage ceremony. Any couple who intend to marry must apply for a marriage license. Usually the license is applied for in the county in which the bride was born in or currently resides in. The couple did not necessarily marry in that county. Once a license was issued, they could marry anywhere they wanted. Usually the certificate of marriage will list the names of the bride and groom, and where both are from. Some marriage certificates also list the names of the parents for the bride and groom as well as their ages. A marriage license can usually be found in the county records of the county where the couple filed for the marriage license. A marriage certificate is found in the actual county of the state where the couple married. Sometimes a marriage license lists whether one or both of the individuals named on the marriage license have been previously married.

If in researching a couple's marriage a license cannot be found, especially if the search is before 1880, it is possible that the couple were married by an Indian ceremony rather than a church or civil ceremony. In some Indian cultures it was the custom that gifts were given to the parents of the prospective bride, if the parents accepted the gifts, then the couple could eventually marry. In this case there is no record of the marriage. Indian style marriages were recognized by the federal courts as legal.

It was very common to find polygamous Indian marriages. Quite often a man was married to more than one Indian woman at the same time (it does not appear that polygamous marriages occurred where a woman had more than one husband at one time). It was very difficult to maintain more than one home, so this is not overly common unless it was a well to do man. A good example of a polygamous marriage is that of Gabriel RENVILLE, or TIWAKAN, a Dakota Indian from the Sisseton Reservation, South Dakota. Gabriel RENVILLE was married to three sisters at his death and had families by all three women. If a man was going to have more than one wife at a time, it was very common for him to marry sisters. Sisters knew each other and were more likely to get along. If a man was widowed it was common that he would marry his first wife's younger sister. It was also common for a widow to marry her late husband's brother.

In most Indian societies, a person could not marry members of their own clan and in the case of the Dakota, any member of their known family. Usually a Mdewakanton Dakota Indian would marry outside of the Mdewakanton Dakota people's, for example they could marry a Sisseton, Wapekute, Wahpeton, Yankton, Yanktonai, or Teton Dakota. An Ojibwe Indian of the Crane Totem, would marry an individual outside of the Crane Totem, for example a person from the Loon Totem. Many Indian societies still follow their tribe's rules about who they can choose as a mate or partner.

The certificate of divorce is usually found in the county in which the divorce occurred. It names both parties to the divorce, the date of the divorce and the grounds for the divorce. If it is known that a couple were living together as husband and wife but a certificate of divorce is not found, it is possible they separated in a way which is called an Indian style divorce. An Indian style divorce is where the couple splits up, the wife going back to her parents home or the man leaves. If they never live together again, the couple is known to have divorced Indian fashion. This type of divorce is accepted by the federal government as legal. Usually both parties remarry in another legal or Indian style ceremony. Indian style divorces have been known to be recognized through federal records up to the early 1900's. It is now the custom of the American Indian to marry and divorce like the rest of American society.

Adoption has occurred in American Indian families. Usually an orphaned child was taken in and raised as a member of another relative's family. However, an individual could have been adopted by an Indian couple and then became their child. Adopted individuals are often hard to recognize unless you know that they were adopted. Some adopted individuals appear on the census rolls as the adopted children of couples. Be aware that an Indian community usually lived in extended family units. Most members of an Indian village were related by blood in a Dakota village. If the father was a Mdewakanton Dakota, then all of his children were Mdewakanton Dakota. If the father was an Ojibwe of the Crane Totem, then all of his children were of the Crain Totem. A person who was an Ojibwe Indian, was related to all people from their individual clan.

Many Native American tribe's or groups had naming practices or patterns for their children. In the Dakota family, the first born child of a couple was called Chaske if a male and Winona if a female. This name usually stayed with the individual for life, but if an important event occurred in the persons life, they may also be given another name which they were then known by. If an individual was known by one name as a child and then by another name as an adult, it may become difficult to trace him or her and their family origins. The Dakota and Ojibwe also named their children for special events and occurrences that were happening at the time of birth. There may or may not be a reason for any Indian name that an individual uses. There may not be a way to prove why a particular name was used or given.

Census records are the second most commonly used item in genealogical research. There are federal census, state census, territorial census, the Annuity Payroll and the Annual Census. Each of these censuses are different.

The federal census was taken by the United States Government every ten years after 1790. The years covered are 1790, 1800, 1810, 1820, 1830, up to 1990. Only those census records up to 1920 are currently available for researchers to use. A census taken after 1920, has to wait until 72 years have lapsed before it is released for public use. If the full name, the full street address, the township, the county and the state an individual family member lived in on a census after 1920 are known, it is possible to obtain a copy of that individual on that particular census. Usually the federal census was taken to help reapportion boundary lines for election purposes, taxation, and for possible use in times of war to know who was of age to fight in the armed services. The federal census records before 1850, usually list the head of the family, then the number of individuals by sex in age groups. Not every individual name in a family unit was listed. After 1850, every individual in the family dwelling was listed, making it easier to identify each family. The relationship to the head of household was given, age, sex (male or female), place of birth, whether able to read and write (on some censuses), and where their parents were born. Different items appear on later censuses. The 1920 census gives the names of each individuals parents, where they're from, and dates of immigration to the United States. Federal census records are usually found in major depositories of records, like the National Archives Regional Branches, state libraries, historical societies, the American Genealogical Lending Library, and the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints (Mormon Church). The federal census microfilm may be purchased through the National Archives Trust Fund, Cashier (NAJC), Washington, D.C. 20408, and through the American Genealogical Lending Library. American Genealogical Lending Library also rents the federal census materials to individuals through their local libraries or institutions.

A state census was taken in some states of the United States. These were usually taken every 10 years in years ending with the numeral 5. For example, Iowa and Minnesota both took censuses in the years 1865, 1875, 1885, 1895, 1905 and Iowa also took censuses in 1915 and 1925. The state census materials collected by individual states before 1850, usually give the name of the head of household and then all the other individuals in the house by sex (male or female) in age groups. Beginning with the 1850 census all the census materials collected contained every individuals name from the household. Varying degrees of information were given on each states census. These census materials were taken to prove boundaries for voting precincts, for tax purposes and to prove the names of males between certain ages that could be inscribed into the service of the state militia(s). Most state census materials are controlled by the state archives or state historical society. Most are available for purchase up to the year 1920. In most cases microfilm copies may be purchased or rented through these state agencies.

Territorial censuses were taken by territorial governments when they were trying to apply for statehood or while working toward statehood. As the United States expanded westward, different areas of the country broke into territories. Minnesota was at one time a part of the Northwest Territory, Indiana Territory, Illinois Territory, Louisiana Territory, Missouri Territory, Michigan Territory, Wisconsin Territory, Iowa Territory and then Minnesota Territory. The earliest known census covering what is now Minnesota was in the Michigan Territory census. It is important to remember to keep track of when the area that now comprises the state of Minnesota was part of each of the above territories prior to statehood. Territorial censuses before 1850 usually give only the head of household and then the number of individuals by sex (male or female) in age groups. After 1850 the territorial census often gives more information (usually similar to the federal census).

There were two types of censuses taken by the federal government on Native Americans. They are called the Annuity Payroll and the Annual Census. These can begin as soon as a tribe started receiving moneys from their treaties with the federal government. An Annuity Payroll was made to show the names of the individuals living on a reservation who were receiving payments through that tribe (these can begin as early as the 1840's). All Indian people had to chose a tribe to receive their payments through by 1885. If they were living in Santee, Nebraska in 1885, they were probably receiving their payments through the Santee Agency and appear on those Payment Rolls. If an individual appeared on an Annuity Payroll, it means they are a member of that tribe. An Annual Census of the tribe was taken periodically (sometimes yearly). This census listed all those individuals considered members of that particular tribe as well as others living there who are not enrolled. An individual could be Menominee Indian and have married a member of the Santee Reservation. They could appear as receiving Annuity Payments through the Annuity Payroll registers but not be an actual member of the Santee tribe. It is also possible that the Santee tribe could have adopted the individual mentioned and they were considered legal members of the tribe and would then appear on the Annual Census Materials. The early census materials often give only the Indian name and age but census materials after about 1886 give English name, Indian name (sometimes both), sex and age. After a few years the age column was changed to an actual date of birth column and after a certain point in time they also added a column for degree of blood. The column with blood degree does not always have an accurate blood degree but it does give the researcher a place to start. It is up to the researcher to find the documentation to prove that an individual's blood degree is really what the census materials show. This can only be accomplished by hands on research. The main census materials available for most of the tribes in the United States begin in 1885 and go through 1940. These census materials have been put on microfilm and are available through the National Archives of the United States in Washington, D.C. (also the Regional Branches of the National Archives) and through the American Genealogical Lending Library. Other organizations have copies of the microfilms which pertain to the Indian groups of their particular area. These are great records to use when trying to prove Indian ancestry between the years of 1885 and 1940.

The Indian people's of Canada also appear in the national census materials of the Canadian Government. Canada took national censuses in 1851, 1861, 1871, etc. up through 1991. The Canadian Government does not allow access to these census materials until they are one hundred years old. The last census available in Canada for researchers to use is currently the census taken in 1891.

Many of the national, state, and territorial census materials have been indexed, and many have not. There are two types of indexes. They are the miracode and soundex. Both types of indexes take the first letter of the name and then give a number value to the consonants of the name. For example, using the surname Anderson, you would keep the A and then use numbers to replace the consonant sounds of n, d and r. You use only the first three consonants. If there are two consonants with the same sound next to each other, say a "d" and a "t", only one is used. These indexes to the names on the census materials are on microfilm. Many are now appearing on CD Rom. One possible problem with these indexes is the use of Indian names and how they may have been cataloged. They could have been cataloged as a common surname or in the case of a name such as Winona Red Crow, the surname could be Red Crow or just Crow. Each and every possibility should be checked. Many names that are not found on the indexes are a result of the handwriting being illegible or impossible to read. Even today some people's handwriting leaves a little to be desired. The handwriting of the people of the past is the same way. For the most part, an index is very useful to the majority of users. People not appearing on the index of the census have been found by going through the census in the county where they were believed to have been. Be persistent in searching, don't give up, the people being searched for are quite possibly there. Try sounding the name out, if it is a name of French origin, talk to a person who speaks French and have them sound the name out. Then go back to search again using the correct pronunciation of the name.

Another common problem with tracing Metis(se), <Metis(se) means mixed blood, in this case an Indian and white>, is the use of dit's or alias's. Most Indian people took surnames in white man's fashion only when they were forced to do so. Many used the surname of a person to whom they felt a close affinity to or their own Indian names. The French surnames were often chosen by the Indians who they traded closely with. The French alias was called a "dit" name. An important event in the individual's life could also change their name. When there was more than one or two men with the same name in a certain vicinity, it was not uncommon for one of them to change their name to distinguish themselves from the other man of the same name (a good example of this is Senior and Junior). Many of the Metis(se) or mixed blood descendants may have followed the same pattern.

As Native American populations came into contact with white society, they also came into contact with the white man's religion. It was not uncommon for a clergyman to meet some of the Native people long before the main body of white men. The fur traders that lived and worked with the Native Americans in the fur trade, often brought a clergyman along in the hopes of trying to civilize them. Many church denominations have had some contact with many of the individual Native American groups. The records of these contacts has been recorded as other records were recorded. When looking for records on a Native American who attended one of these churches, look for their records in the actual church register or at the archives of the church. Warning, not all churches kept more than one copy of their register from the beginning, and many of the churches that had only one single copy may have had these records destroyed by flood, fire, or some other catastrophe. Many Native American communities have two or three churches. Be sure to check all of the local churches. For church parishes no longer in existence it may be necessary to find that church denomination's closest archival center to locate the records. Very early records may possibly be found in the state historical society of the state to which they pertain. Do not be surprised if the records are hard to find or if they have been lost due to mishandling or disaster.

Remember that the church and it's organizations were the very things that white society were trying to use to mainstream the Native American into white society. The church controlled many of the Indian schools and training centers. The church may have more records on Native Americans than is generally thought. In the late 1800's and early 1900's, many of the tribal children were sent off to boarding schools, supposedly to help them assimilate into white society. Pipestone Agency, Flandreau Agency and White Earth all had boarding schools. These school records are housed at the school (if still in existence) or have been transferred to an archives such as that of the federal government. In this instance, most of these school records are in the National Archives Regional Branch in Kansas City, and maybe some are in Chicago, and then some papers may still be filed in the National Archives in Washington, D.C.

Many Native American people served in the armed services of their state and the United States Government. If they served in the services, there is probably a record of their service. If they were wounded or crippled from war wounds, they may have received a pension. If they or their wife collected a pension, there is a record. Records before World War I are probably on file in the National Archives or the state archives. Pension files may contain only a page or two, but there are some files that are hundreds of pages long. Many service records since World War I are in the state service records. These records may or may not give complete family data. They are worth searching for. The service record of the ancestor of a researched Dakota family was located while searching for family papers. The service record contained eighty to ninety pages. In the service record it gave the name of his first wife, whom nothing was known about, as well as the name of his second wife, their marriage date and place. The names of all children were given in order of birth. One of the papers in the packet stated that he was one half Mdewakanton Dakota. This paper along with other documents which had been found, proved to be valuable in proving the family blood line.

The Native American can fall under tribal court, federal court, state court and or county court jurisdiction. Most Native American records appear under the tribal court or federal court jurisdiction. The tribal court usually handles any case the tribe puts before it. Federal court was supposed to oversee the probating of Native American people and their Tribal Lands. However, many probates have been completed at the county or state level for some of these tribal people. This in itself creates a situation which may make it hard to locate a probate. A will may be accepted at face value by the courts or it may not. Many Native Americans didn't make a will, so the courts follow state and federal laws in creating an heirship. Most probates completed at the county level are filed at the county level. They may also have been cross filed with the Bureau of Indian Affairs Area Office closest to the reservation with jurisdiction. If the probate was completed in a federal court, the final probate is on file in the federal location of the said probate and probably also in the Bureau of Indian Affairs Area Office closest to it. For all Minnesota probates, searches should be at the Aberdeen Area Office of the Bureau of Indian Affairs in Aberdeen, South Dakota or the Eastern Area Office of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, 1951 Constitution Avenue NW., Washington, D.C. 20245. Usually the records are on microfiche with the originals having been transferred to the National Archives in Washington, D.C.. These probates give the name of the deceased, his date of death, place of death, date of birth, place of birth, name of spouse(s), name of children (living and deceased), parentage and any pertinent material needed for the probate. One of the problems with these probates is that they often list the names of children without giving further family background such as parentage and grandparents. This can make it hard to pursue a family genealogy. Many probates give this information, but some do not. Do not expect probates to give everything in a nutshell because they may not. If a tribal allottee had sold his or her interest in an allotment, there may not have been anything left for the courts to probate. In this instance, there may be many individuals for whom no federal probate will be found.

Land and allotment records vary from tribe to tribe. All Indian lands were held in trust by the federal government for the use of the tribe and it's people. The federal government therefore had to keep a record of the lands it held in trust. These records should be on file in the Federal Land Registers in Washington, D.C. as well as the Area Offices of the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

In 1885, the federal government passed a bill called the General Allotment Act which caused many Indian lands to be divided and divvied out to heads of families, single adults and children born by a certain date. Usually the individual had to be at least one quarter Indian blood to qualify (in some tribes it was necessary to be one half or more). To prove that an individual qualified for an allotment, they had to first prove their family heritage. Family registers were set up and the heirship (probate) records of these people used to pass on the family lands to their relatives and descendants. As long as the family lived on the lands, the land would be held in trust for them by the federal government. If an allottee died, before their lands could be sold, all legal heirs had to agree to the sale. If one person disagreed with the sale, the land could not be sold. The Allottee's land could also be reapportioned to the family or an individual member of the family.

Federal laws in force at the time of allotment created a big conflict for the peoples of Indian descent as they were used to the land belonging to all of them as a whole, not one individual alone. That was one of the things that made it hard for their culture to adjust. In Native American culture what was on the land belonged to every person and was for all of their use. Federal laws maintained well into the twentieth century that a full blood Indian was incompetent and could not handle their own matters but a mixed blood was competent. Everyone can recognize the flaws in that logic. The full blood could not sell their land without permission of the federal government but their mixed blood relatives could. All land transactions were usually recorded in the county recorders office.

There are many miscellaneous materials that may be used to prove a families background. A newspaper (there are Indian newspapers and publications) may show the names of people as they are born, baptized, married, died and buried. An obituary in a newspaper may be only a few lines to many columns long. An obituary is good because it often states all known descendants and often gives the names of parents and other known relatives along with a relationship to the deceased as well as where many of them may be living at the time. A birth will usually give the child's name, date and place of birth, and parents names. A marriage notice tells the name of the bride and groom, the date and place of the marriage and often the names of the couple's parents.

Many Indian communities have one or more of their own cemeteries. Many of these cemeteries are aligned with a church. The cemetery records will usually show the name of the individual buried in the cemetery by plot number. The actual tombstone will show the name of the deceased, their date of death and possibly their date of birth. The person buried in a plot may be the person who bought the lot, or it may be a family member or a friend. If the person being researched was Indian but can not be found buried on the reservation where they were enrolled, it is possible they married a white person and lived elsewhere and were buried by their spouse or that they moved elsewhere and are buried where they died. An example of a problem encountered trying to prove an Indian connection to the Fox tribe was that the ancestor had married a white fur trader. She never lived on the reservation with her people and hence does not appear among their records. She was buried next to her husband after she died.

The sexton of the cemetery (often the caretaker of the cemetery), may also have other information in their files to help show family relationships and other records which may show living family members. Some family graves have markers indicating their deceased loved one served in the armed services. Their tombstone may have a marking which shows they were in the service which may lead to other records. Many individuals were buried with military honors. The sexton's records may also have very little in the file, but these records are worth checking.

Many churches have published histories or other publications which may also show information on individuals. The Catholic and Lutheran churches have their own denominational publications.

Family Bibles are another important source for information on families. Many people record births, deaths and marriages in their family Bible. One thing to watch for in a family Bible is whether they were recorded at the time of the event or later. In comparing dates in a family Bible with those displayed on tombstone's, some discrepancies were found. Upon finding that the publication date of the Bible was 1880 and noting that almost all of the births had occurred between 1847 and 1875 it was easy to determine that the dates had been written in long after the event had taken place and a couple of the dates had been recorded incorrectly. Always remember to double check other people's records to make sure they are accurate.

Guild records are another source of information to fill in the flesh on a family history. If the person being researched was a blacksmith and belonged to a blacksmith guild, the guild itself may have the records necessary to tell why he abruptly moved during a certain point in time. If he was a jeweler, the guild records may tell where he did his training or apprenticeship.

City Directories were published early in many larger cities. The city directory will show the actual address where an individual was living by year and often their occupation. The city directory usually lists adult members of the family but once in a while a child's name will be included. It is often possible to tell when an individual has died because he disappears from the city directory while other family members are still listed.

Telephone directories will show the place of residence (city and often street address) of individuals who had a telephone each year as well as their telephone number.

School records are kept on all individuals who attend school. There is usually a complete file on all their teachers names, dates the individual attended school, the types of subjects they studied, their pictures and their complete report cards. Many schools have year books and these can also place the individual in a certain school and give a glimpse of what they may have looked like.

City, county and state histories often have stories about the important and early families of their area. If an ancestor was one of the first white men to live in a county, the county history may list him and give other information about him and his family which could be used to fill in the holes in his family tree. Remember the larger the area that a history covers, the more likely that there will be less information on the individuals who lived there.

Published family histories and genealogies are appearing all over the world. Many of these published genealogies and histories are very good while others are fabrications. Always double check the authors work before accepting it as fact. Contrary to what many people think, just because something is in print does not make it factually accurate let alone provable. If the records an individual used to create their family history cannot be located, they can not be accepted as factually accurate. Always try to make sure that statements being made are factually accurate. It is best to use two or more sources that will prove the point being made when possible. Anyone can write and publish a family history, but if another researcher then comes along and pulls records that could also have been pulled by the first researcher while creating their work and the newly added materials prove something different than the original findings, that means the entire family history may be questionable. Always document sources used for future researchers.

Tax records can usually pinpoint an individual in a certain place and time but since most Indians lived on reservations, they were not taxable. This area doesn't help much unless the people lived off the reservation. If so, then they may have left record of where they were living by paying state and/or federal taxes. These records can then place them at a certain place at the time taxes became due. The county tax records could tell their street address at a given point in time.

The fur trade can not be overlooked while doing Native American research. Once the researcher gets back to a certain point in time, they will find that their Native American ancestor probably traded with fur traders to get his supplies. His name may appear on the lists of individuals who owed the fur traders and fur companies money. This will place them at a certain location at a specific time period for the researcher. The fur traders often mentioned other items in their ledgers, such as the daughter of so and so married with such and such voyageur on a certain date. That little tidbit would be a great piece of knowledge to the right individual doing family research.

It was very common for the voyageurs to cohabit with Native American women. This practice supposedly obligated the Native American woman's family and village (remember many villages were extended families, all people were somehow related) to trade with that individual fur trader. When the fur trader was moved, he very often left his Native American wife and family with her people and cohabited with another Native American woman in the next village of employment. The fur trader could also take his Native American wife and family with him when he moved. Many voyageurs remained in the wild with their Native American wives and families while many also left them behind to resettle into white society. Many Native American women also helped the store clerks and fur trade overseers to maintain and run their departments. The Native American people were very involved in the fur trade.

There are many other records which can be searched for genealogical and historical research. Remember to always document your findings, stating the date the item was found, the place they were found <give the full name and street address>, and the item itself (always state the library call numbers if from a library). When researching for a particular person, always record the names of all individuals in the area with the same surname. It may be found later that they are relatives and therefore another part of the family to include in the family history. Remember to be aware of the history of the area being searched. If searching during the Civil War, wouldn't it be nice to know that the war was taking place in the backyard of an ancestor before doing research and not being able to figure out why he isn't there during a certain time frame and to know why. In order to really understand what's going on with a family, it is necessary to know what was occurring around them. Important events alter everyone's lives (then and now).

Our Collection

In 1990 we began publishing a subject bibliography of our collection in our newsletter Cousins et Cousines. After 4 years we finished going through the entire shelf list from start to finish. Since beginning many new items have been cataloged. From this date forward additions to the collection will be listed in this our Journal. Back issues of the newsletter unfortunately are not available, however, at some time in the future we will publish a complete listing of our holdings in a separate publication. To answer the most asked question, "How can I use the collection?" Unfortunately, the collection is permanent and can not be loaned out either by mail or to walk in patrons. The good news is that this means when you come to the library you know the book will be here. A limited amount of work will be done for members living far from our collection by mail. You know what we have, we will try to look up specific questions for you in the requested source(s). Please include a business sized self addressed stamped envelope for a reply.

French-Canadian Genealogical Research, by John P. DuLONG, Ph.D. - 71 pgs.

This guide provides an excellent introduction to the common sources and records used to trace French Canadian families. It is well written so that even the beginner will benefit immediately from the material presented. More advanced researchers will want a copy of this guide for quick reference. Apparently the author is writing a more definitive guide which should be welcomed by persons researching French Canadians, Acadians, Metis and Huguenot families. We do hope that guide will give "good examples" as well as "how to" and "where to" information that so many guides tend to overlook. We do not have information as to when that guide will be completed but assume it will be a while off. In the mean time this guide will have to hold us over while we wait.
