Edwards Genealogical Request

My great grandfather William Albert Edwards (WAE) was born in 1808 in Waterford, Ireland and married Margaret Shannon there. They had one son and four daughters as follows: Anna Marie, Maria Theresa, Margaret Jane, Eaton Albert (my grandfather) and Elizabeth.

The parents of WAE were Eaton and Mary Edwards. They had 13 children whose names I do not know except my great grandfather Edwards. Eaton Edwards was born in Saint John, New Brunswick, probably around 1783, when some 10,000 Loyalists moved there from New England, U.S.A. during the American Revolution.

I do not know the first names of my great, great, great grandparents (parents of Eaton Edwards). However, from the names of their offspring and their offspring, I can guess.

The father of Eaton Edwards could have been Albert, William or George Edwards. In addition, the name Wharton comes up several times. Other less likely names (but offspring) would be John, Frederick, Frank and Lester.

The mother of Eaton Edwards could have been Margaret, Elizabeth, Jane, Theresa, Maria or Anna Edwards. Other less likely names (but still offspring) would be Meta, Belle, Kate, Helen, Nancy and Ada.

My great, great, great grandparents Edwards were probably born around 1758 in New England, U.S.A. and moved to Saint John in 1783.

My great, great grandfather Eaton Edwards was born in Saint John and may have not married his wife Mary until he moved to Waterford, Ireland.

My great grandfather William Albert Edwards was born in Waterford, Ireland in 1808 and married Margaret Shannon there. They moved to Connecticut (with five children) in 1861 and both died in Connecticut, U.S.A. several years later.

My grandfather Eaton Albert Edwards was born in Waterford, Ireland in 1845. He married Mary Lucinda Conger and they had four children. He died in 1916 and his wife died in 1921, both in Connecticut, U.S.A.

My father George Wharton Edwards married Elizabeth Bowyer Garland. Both were born in the U.S.A. in 1891, he died in 1940 and she in 1942. They had three children.

Myself (George Wharton Edwards, Jr.) married Norma Louise Spongberg. We were both born in 1924 and had two children, Elizabeth Ann Edwards Miller and John Garland Edwards II. Elizabeth Ann was born in 1950 and died in 1980. Jack was born in 1961 and has not yet married.

Any information I can obtain on my great, great, great grandparents Edwards will be gratefully received.

Submitted by Saint John Branch of the New Brunswick Genealogical Society

The following paper was presented at the 1983 International Genealogical Workshop in Saint John, New Brunswick on Monday, August 1, 1983. It was prepared for Dr. Ralph J. Crandall, Director of the New England Historic Genealogical Society, by Mr. George Sanborn, and was indeed very well received and is worthy of reproduction in this newsletter.

SO NEAR, BUT YET SO FAR:

THE MIGRATION OF MASSACHUSETTS LOYALISTS
TO THE MARITIMES

As I drove to Saint John on the Interstate and Trans-Canada Highways, and crossed the border with so little fuss, I paused to reflect how simple a matter it is nowadays to travel between our two great countries and even to move permanently from one to the other. How different the situation is from 200 years ago. Those Loyalists we are here to remember today would scarcely have thought this meeting would be taking place. They would have found it difficult to conceive of the friendship and cooperation which exists between Canadians and Americans, indeed between Englishmen and Americans.

It is hard for us now to realize the humiliation and hardships these people had suffered in their own homes, and hard for us to grasp the magnitude of the inner resolve which each of them had to make to leave the comforts of whatever station in life they enjoyed, and start out again in a largely unsettled new place which lacked the amenities they had come to expect in life. Some of these folk had to abandon positions of relative ease and influence, being the educated intelligentsia of their communities in Massachusetts, and enjoying positions of wealth and influence; most were farmers, merchants and tradesmen. They were afraid - afraid not only for their lives, but afraid of the unknown and of their changing fortunes.

Most had a keen interest in preserving their positions and wealth in their homes. They were enjoying good lives, and were motivated to improve their lot even further. The Crown had treated them well; they were prospering. How could anyone be sure life would be as good under a new government and social order, rather hastily conceived by a small group of men who, it is certain, were not absolutely selfless in their great plans? How could anyone be sure that this small group of American Patriots, as the leaders of the popular revolt called themselves, did not actually harbor designs of a new despotism with themselves as the core of a new aristocracy purely for their own self-aggrandizement ? And, should all this come to pass, as many feared, what fate awaited those who were reluctant to support the overthrow ?

Some fled right away, going to larger centers within the colonies where the climate appeared more stable. Still others took no chances and went on to the other British colonies, such as Bermuda or the Bahamas, which were not far away; yet others simply "packed it in" as people now say, and went straight to the Motherland itself. Few left the Thirteen Colonies for British North America in those early years before 1783, and it is interesting to speculate why.

Perhaps, psychologically, these people felt that they could fit into the new social order and find a niche for themselves in the new country. Indeed, if they had not been abused and harrassed, many would probably have stayed. And many did stay, choosing to resettle in places where they were not known, or heading for remote areas where they hoped they would be left alone. The others who stayed, though not really happy about the turn of events, perhaps felt that they could learn to live with the new regime and social order, provided they could carry on their business as usual and continue to enjoy life as they had known it. Looking back, it seems that those most determined to leave the Thirteen Colonies were often those people of the merchant class, members of the government and military, and those who had received government appointments, commissions, or some other form of kingly munificence, and who felt great attachment, admiration and, yes, loyalty to the Crown. And, we must admit, from their point of view, rightly so.

But why the initial hesitation of many to resettle in British North America ? It would have been closer to home in a familiar environment.

Many have spoken of the wilderness in the Maritimes and the rough life these often gentle folk would encounter there. The civilization of England seemed preferable, it is claimed. Yet the people did not flock there. They waited, as if undecided what to do. And we have to agree that the Maritimes were not totally wild and unsettled. Acadians and pre-Loyalists had been in this area for years. Coastal areas, river valleys, and bays and harbors had met the ploughman, the fisherman and the ship chandler. Halifax was a bustling city, having published a newspaper continuously for 31 years by 1783. The Foreign Protestants along Nova Scotia's Southern Shore, the New Englanders throughout peninsular Nova Scotia and many parts of mainland Nova Scotia (which we now call New Brunswick), and early society in St. John's Island (now known as Prince Edward Island) had brought not only civilization to these areas, but great opportunities for the ambitious to jump in and expand their fortunes. Still they waited.

The late Gerald Keith of Saint John, who would have enjoyed this summer's celebration, and possibly others, may have discovered the reason for this hesitation to migrate hither "too soon", before the situation could be more accurately assessed. Unpublished documents which Mr. Keith uncovered in his many years of diligent research into the history of the pre-Loyalist settlements in the St. John River Valley, convincingly show that these former Massachusetts people were quite sympathetic to the cause of the Patriots in the American colonies. Indeed, many maintained close family ties there. Secret negotiations are hinted at in the records, and delegations of highly-respected representatives of such communities as Maugerville, New Brunswick and Rowley, Massachusetts, visited each other for the obvious purpose of deciding what they should do about joining the rebellion. In Nova Scotia, often called the "Fourteenth Colony", the well-established towns, full of New Englanders, had every reason to be interested in the fate of their old homeland, their kinsmen and, let's be frank, their trading centers where they not only bought but sold goods and produce.

Could it be that the pro-rebellion sentiments and leanings of the former New Englanders in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were more widely known than we have thought, and were a real cause of concern to the American Loyalists? Would these latter have come here sooner and in greater numbers, had there not been the danger that Nova Scotia (including present-day New Brunswick) was about to fall in behind the "other Thirteen" and weigh anchor on that terrible new uncharted course? I hope that more research will be done on this fascinating question.

We are here celebrating the birth of the great city of Saint John - today a busy seaport attracting people from all over the Maritimes and the world to work here, yet mindful of its heritage and now busily engaged in restoring the historic downtown area. Saint John is indeed the Loyalist City, with thousands of people proudly tracing descent from its founders, those Loyalists who, finally satisfied of the solidly pro-British stance of Nova Scotia, decided to settle here in 1783. People proudly claim ancestors who arrived on the "Spring Fleet", just as others may aver that their ancestor came to the New World on the "Mayflower". Indeed, ladies and gentlemen, many of you can proudly claim both. This fact alone will show you how closely the people of New England and the Maritimes are bound together. We share geography, climate, and the whimsy of economic changes, but we also share the commonalities of language, culture and even ancestry itself.

The Revolution saw not only the public hardships which both the Patriots and the Loyalists had to undergo, but must have carried with it many instances of human tragedy which we will never know about. Let us pause to consider how many families must have been torn apart by bitter arguments between father and son, brother and brother-in-law, husband and wife. Think of the distress when a woman was forbidden by her husband to speak to her relatives because of a difference of political opinion. And how many times do you suppose a brother was called upon to oust his own sister and her family from their home ? How many fathers had to hang their heads in shame at the general store when men who were gathered there remarked loudly about their sons' failure to sign the Association Test, that famous document gathered in each town in many parts of New England whereby men had to declare, over their signatures, that they would take up arms against England . . . or not ? The human stories must be there, even though we shall never know them all.

Many of you, rightfully interested in women's issues in our modern age, will want to investigate further the effects of the war and the social upheavals on 50% of the population in the latter half of the 1700s by reading Mary Beth Norton's "Eighteenth-Century American Women in Peace and War: The Case of the Loyalists", in the William and Mary Quarterly of July 1976, and her later book on the subject.

It is often said that "blood is thicker than water", and while the scientific truth of that is undisputable, the social truth is a matter of record. Since 1783 passions have cooled. World events have caused our two great nations to lean on each other for support. Millions of Americans have moved north of the border to take up new lands, or seek a new life in a less populous place, or expand their business by branching out in areas where they saw a ready market; millions of Canadians went south of the border to find work in American cities and factories, to look for gold, to settle on flat, fertile farms in the Mid-West, or retire in Florida. In many ways we are one people. Amusingly, the British have thought so for a long time, for we all sound alike to them !

The Loyalists, once uprooted from their homes, were a restless flock. Many, disenchanted with the hardships in the Maritimes, left for England or Ontario after a brief stay. The more affluent could afford homes in two places. Many, such as those who settled on Prince Edward Island, were disillusioned at finding they were pawns in a great struggle between township proprietors and the government over rents due on the land. The majority of that group of Loyalists who went to Prince Edward Island from Shelburne, Nova Scotia, in July of 1784, had left the Island by 1786, moving on where better terms could be had. Descendants of those who remained were still petitioning the Prince Edward Island Legislative Assembly for an adjustment of terms as late as 1833, for the land question on Prince Edward Island was always chaotic. The petitions for land grants on record at the Public Archives of Nova Scotia and the Public Archives of New Brunswick, make interesting reading, and provide a wealth of information for people tracing their ancestors.

The Loyalists' problems were not over once they were here. Former professional people could not find work. As one young attorney put it, Nova Scotia was "overstocked with starved Lawyers", and he could have added clerics, doctors and former civil officials. The only way such people could continue to live in the style to which they were accustomed was to acquire a government post. These were at a premium, and required money, friends and influence to get. There just were not enough positions to go around, and these were especially hard to come by in Nova Scotia since Governor John Parr, for whom Parrsboro is named, disliked the refugees intensely. The latter organized a campaign to replace the Governor, which failed, and this naturally irked him even more. He once said that the Loyalists had given him "many anxious disagreeable and distressing hours". It was not until John Wentworth took over as Governor in 1792, himself the former Governor of New Hampshire, that the situation improved.

The Nova Scotian government at Halifax found it hard to govern the thousands of Loyalists on the mainland, and so in 1784, scarcely a year after the 12,000 Loyalists arrived here in the Spring and Fall fleets, New Brunswick was erected into a separate colony. Times were hard; it was not always easy to get land, even though the British government had provided much assistance, and had given military officers half-pay. Government restrictions in 1790, and worsening economic conditions, were the last straw for many, who went to other colonies, or, interestingly, went back to the United States. We shall see in what follows examples of each of these cases.

I would like to turn now to a closer examination of the lives and experiences of five Loyalists. Many of us are familiar with the fabled careers of such notables as the Wentworths, Winslows, Coffins and others. I have selected for examination five men and their families who are less well known, but about whom documentation can be found for a close study of their interesting lives. The dramas here presented will not be lost on the audience.

Our first subject will be Captain Jeremiah Pecker, a native of Haverhill, Massachusetts, a Congregationalist, and a graduate of Harvard College in the Class of 1757. He obtained a Master of Arts from the same institution, having received a scholarship but not otherwise gaining and special recognition. Indeed, contemporaries later said that "he did not possess much literary talent".

Be that as it may, Mr. Pecker became a teacher in Lynn, Massachusetts. Teachers then were not paid much for their labors, and the gentleman soon opened a tavern in his native Haverhill, which failed a few years later. He went back into teaching there, and married, but soon after turns up in Fort Pownal, Maine, where he is styled "Captain". Maine, it will be remembered, was part of Massachusetts Bay until 1820.

The Captain disappeared from that region on August 26, 1776, after this graphic yet amusing incident. He and another man rowed out to an armed sloop. Discovering that it was a rebel vessel rather than a British one, he jumped back into his boat and made for the shore crying "Was ever there a man so damnably mistaken as I was". The rebel boat gave chase, but, as his companion later remarked, "Pecker wouldn't stop and when they fired three guns at us I entreated Pecker to stop but couldn't prevail on him but he put the boat on shore and took to the woods". Local people saw in this a plan on Mr. Pecker's part to escape on a king's ship, and give information to the king's forces concerning their defenceless situation in that remote spot.

Captain Pecker made his way safely to Nova Scotia where he spent the rest of the war actively employed in the Naval Department. After the Peace, he moved to Saint John where he became a Freeman in 1785, and resumed his old occupation of schoolmaster. One of his pupils, Ward Chipman, in 1797, wrote to his father saying "I wish Sir you would present my most affectionate love and respect to . . . old Master Pecker if he is not dead drunk when you see him as I fancy he will be." Old Master Pecker spent the rest of his days in this city.

Let us now consider the pageantry of Dr. John Calef, a native of Ipswich, Massachusetts, a member of a solid family and whose grandfather was the author of the satire on witchcraft entitled, More Wonders of the Invisible World. Dr. Calef was a surgeon, and had served King George II as surgeon in the navy and army during the wars, being present at Louisbourg. In 1763, after the war with France was over, he settled in his native Ipswich where he was chosen a member of the Massachusetts House of Representatives. Siding with the King as early as 1768 in a political issue of great local interest, he lost the confidence of the people and many men in his own medical profession.

In 1773 the inhabitants of Penobscot, in eastern Maine, delegated him, he being no stranger in that country, to go to England to get royal approval for a grant of thirteen townships by the General Assembly of Massachusetts in 1763, lying to the eastward of the Penobscot River. He was not immediately successful on that mission, but was sympathetically received. He was told to return to Penobscot and quiet the people. It is said that he travelled eight times through the country, confirming the people in their loyalty, and preventing them, through his influence, from joining the rebellion.

During the rebellion he was detained, tried and abused by the mob several times. The Provincial Congress took away a ship recently built for him, together with the cargo, valued at £ 4,200 sterling, and used it for the provincial navy. Over the next three years he was continuously harrassed because he refused to take up arms against the King. Several times his house was fired into at night, terrorizing his wife and ten children. He was threatened, finally, with execution at his own door. With this, he abandoned his family and fled to Penobscot.

The people there were loyal to the King, and Dr. Calef sailed for Halifax to seek protection for the area. En route his boat was captured by a privateer from Halifax, and he was robbed of everything, including his vessel. He was present during the operations of British forces at Penobscot, and was appointed Inspector and Justice of the Peace over the inhabitants and Superintendent of the Indians at Penobscot. In a claim to the government for compensation he said that he had lost over £ 9,000 worth of property to the rebels.

He asked the Provincial Congress at Watertown, Massachusetts, for permission to sail his ship laden with provisions from Danvers, Massachusetts, to Penobscot where, it is reported, most of the inhabitants had subsisted for some time on fish alone, and where many families had had no bread or meal for months. The Congress refused his request as it was "inconsistent with the best interest of the colony."

In the same year, Dr. Calef presented a memorial to the King on behalf of the proprietors of twelve townships in the territory known as Sagadahoc, in what is now Maine. There had been a great increase in the number of settlers there, and on Deer and Fox islands, and most desired a separate government from Massachusetts. Some British officials saw in this restless population of over 20,000 a chance to create a territory for persecuted Loyalists of New England. Governor Hutchinson himself wrote that he thought it inevitable this territory would secede from Massachusetts Bay.

Four years later Dr. Calef went secretly by a small boat from Penobscot to Annapolis Royal, Nova Scotia, to suggest to his Majesty's officers that a great part of the inhabitants of the eastern country of Massachusetts (now Maine) wished to remain under the British Government, and to recommend establishing a post there. The officers advised him to return and "prepare the minds of the people for any eventuality," and they would relay his message to England. Subsequent visits by the officers found that he had dutifully carried out his instructions. He then journeyed to England with a petition from the inhabitants for the King requesting that they be separated from Massachusetts and made a separate colony.

This never came about as conditions worsened in New England. If it had occurred, no doubt a glorious career would have awaited Dr. Calef, for he was the most respected leader of the eastern part of Massachusetts.

In 1784 he was in England making a claim for compensation. The Commissioners were so impressed with his spirit and loyalty that they allowed him £ 50 for expenses and his passage back to New Brunswick, where he seems to have been living. He was appointed Surgeon to the garrison here in Saint John that same year. Of his claim for £9,880 18s in compensation, he was awarded £2,400, with £ 100 per annum for the loss of his income during the war.

It was falsely said of him while he lived in Saint John that he spread scandalous reports of moral impropriety on the part of the Bishop of Nova Scotia, Dr. Charles Inglis. Inglis described Dr. Calef as a "weak enthusiastical man." The Bishop was told that Calef was a man who would "alternately pray and whims with Methodists, get drunk, and blaspheme like an atheist." Dr. Calef, when threatened with an action for slander, said he spoke only in a "ludicrous way," without intending to harm the Bishop's reputation.

He removed to St. Andrews where he subsequently died in 1812. Mr. George Mowat of St. Andrews, Dr. Calef's great-grandson, had his family Bible and some of the doctor's furniture some 50 - 60 years ago.

I should digress here briefly to tell a bit about the Penobscot country and the Loyalists there. Six tracts of shore and river lots, covering almost half the length of Charlotte County had been granted to the Penobscot Associated Loyalists in 1784, for their resettlement, and the history of the area is most interesting. Listeners are referred to volume 3 of the journal Acadiensis for some of the background. The old Penobscot area lay east of the Kennebec River and west of the St. Croix, and there was doubt and confusion in both the American and the British colonies as to whether the territory really was part of Massachusetts or Nova Scotia. It was variously called the District of Acadia or the District of Sagadahoc. The inhabitants were nearly all from southern Maine, however, and traded with Boston. This "buffer zone" was considered by many to be out of the jurisdiction of either of the afore-mentioned colonies.

In 1779, England ordered a military post to be constructed at Penobscot Bay, where Castine, Maine, now is, to be a place of refuge and protection for the Loyalists of Maine. Since everyone believed the new demarcation line would be the Penobscot River, the new fort was built there. Here would be the capital of the new province, to be called New Ireland, and which would be a British Crown Colony. However, before the fort could be completed it was destroyed by a force sent out from Boston. The attackers paid dearly for their victory, and this dissuaded them from further attacks against Nova Scotia and the Canadas. Details of the attack on Penobscot come largely from a journal kept by Dr. Calef.

When the Peace was signed, the Crown ceded the Penobscot country. Had this not happened, the international boundary would in all likelihood now be the Penobscot River. The Penobscot region was evacuated in January of 1784 and was the last American territory occupied by the King's forces. The people were mostly resettled at St. Andrews, but many, wishing to be surely within British territory, settled first at St. George.

Another interesting family were Robert and Miriam Pagan. Robert Pagan was born in Glasgow, Scotland; he was a shipbuilder and lumber merchant at Greenock in that country, and with two of his brothers, settled at Falmouth (now Portland), Maine, where he continued as a partner in the old Greenock firm. His wife was a daughter of Capt. Jeremiah Pote of Falmouth, himself a Loyalist who followed much the same later route that Mr. Pagan took. Having become involved in a Committee listing the holders of tea in Falmouth, and later involved in other controversies of the time, he incurred the displeasure of many local people. His store at Falmouth was tarred and feathered; he was insulted, and his life was threatened by mobs. Finally, his house and store were burned down when Falmouth was destroyed in 1775. He retired inland, but the harassment continued. Finally, he and his wife and family embarked secretly in the night for Barbados in a ship belonging to his firm. But the brigantine was taken and condemned at Antigua, en route, and sold there at auction. Mr. Pagan went from there to New York, where he was engaged in business for four years, and a person of his name briefly appears at Philadelphia. He went back to Maine, settling in Penobscot. He was appointed a magistrate. Others had come there for safety at the invitation of his Majesty's government, and it is likely that the Pagans did the same. The people lived in houses or huts on small lots of cleared land which they were granted, a humble situation indeed.

Mr. Pagan and his two brothers, in the course of business in New York and Penobscot, lost, mostly by capture, 36 vessels of which they were the sole or principal owners. One can almost feel the economic strain this family suffered.

Over 100 families at Penobscot petitioned for permission to remove into Nova Scotia to escape threats and to seek better fortune generally. This interesting petition is followed by a list of houses and their owners' names. The evacuation of Penobscot lent urgency to their appeal. At that time, Mr. Pagan filed a claim for £ 864, of which £ 100 was granted by the Crown. He, too, settled at St. Andrews where he was active and popular in public affairs, and was a magistrate, judge of a court, colonel of militia, and a member of the first House of Assembly of New Brunswick. He died in St. Andrews in 1821. His brother, William, was chosen an alderman of the first council of the City of Saint John, forerunner of today's Common Council, and also served in the House, dying in Fredericton in 1819. Their brother, Thomas, removed from New Brunswick to Halifax, and died in 1804 in Scotland.

A reproduction of paintings of Robert and Miriam (Pote) Pagan appears in volume 2 of Acadiensis, the originals of which were last known to be in Vancouver. The couple had no children. Mrs. Pagan died in St. Andrews in 1828.

There is a great variety to the interesting lives, careers and migration routes of the Loyalists, as we see by comparing the foregoing to that of Mr. Martin Gay, a prosperous Boston merchant and coppersmith. Mr. Gay was an eye-witness to the Battle of Bunker Hill, and letters of his, still preserved and published, provide us with one of only two first-hand accounts of the famous battle, as well as a view of Revolutionary Boston from the inside. These, together with some letters penned by his wife, are printed in the February 1897 issue of The Colonial Society of Massachusetts Journal.

Mr. Gay was a native of Hingham, Massachusetts, was twice married, and had nine children. He is variously called a coppersmith and a brass-founder, and was commissioned a Captain of the Antient and Honorable Artillery Company by Governor Thomas Hutchinson, the original commission being preserved among descendants in Massachusetts. Mr. Gay was, additionally, a church deacon, and the minister of that church in Hingham was married to the Captain's sister.

Shortly after the Battle of Lexington, the church was used as a British barracks. Fearful that something might happen to the church's silver, the deacons were asked to care for it. Though the pastor was a pro-Patriot, he decided to move from Hingham to Nova Scotia because he believed he could get a settlement as a minister there. He urged those of his congregation who wished to accompany him to come along. They went before the evacuation of Boston, but Martin Gay stayed until the evacuation, at which time, fearful of what would happen to the silver, he carried it to Nova Scotia, where he kept it until it was safe to send it back to Massachusetts, the minister and his family having, by that time, returned to Hingham.

Mr. Gay had several minor elected positions of trust up until 1774 when, presumably due to his publicly-avowed loyalism, he no longer appeared in the records as a public servant. In the list of the inhabitants of Boston who, on the evacuation of the British troops in March, 1776, removed to Halifax with the army, is found the name of Martine Gay with the number "3" after it, indicating that two people accompanied him in his party. One is believed to be his daughter, Mary, who later married the well-known Rev. William Black of Halifax, and whose son, Martin Gay Black, appeared many years later in Prince Edward Island.

Martin Gay remained in Nova Scotia during the whole period of the Revolution. He visited Boston in 1787, four years after the Peace, and in 1788 went to England, presumably to obtain compensation for losses as a Loyalist. He remained there two years, and in 1792 went again to Boston to reside for the rest of his life.

One of his sons became a permanent resident of New Brunswick, and was for several years a member of the Provincial House of Assembly for Westmorland County and Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas. By his second wife, Martin Gay's only surviving child graduated from Harvard College in 1789, practiced law, and became a member of the Massachusetts State Senate. Here we have two half-brothers following similar vocations, one in New Brunswick and one in Massachusetts, both highly regarded where they lived.

On his return to Boston in 1792, Martin Gay resumed his business as a coppersmith at his former shop. He died in 1809, and his widow followed him to the grave the next year. He was buried in the old Granary Burial Ground in Boston near where the present-day Park Street Congregational Church is on Boston Common, but which at that time had not been built. While resident in England, Mr. Gay had a portrait in pastel made of himself which, at the turn of the century, was in the possession of his grandson, W. Allan Gay, of Hingham, Massachusetts, and which was reproduced in the New York Times issue of Friday, June 23, 1978 in connection with an article concerning his letter about the Battle of Bunker Hill which was going to be auctioned for a high price.

Our last subject today is Mr. Benjamin Marston, a native of Salem, Massachusetts, and a graduate of Harvard College in 1749. From letters of his it seems that he travelled in other British colonies and in Europe after he graduated from college. Following his marriage, Benjamin Marston settled in Marblehead, Massachusetts, where, for many years, he carried on a large and successful business as a merchant. At the time he left the colonies in 1775, he owned several stores and warehouses, and, jointly with partners, he had several large ships, one of which was employed in the London trade. He also owned much real estate in Marblehead and elsewhere, including an elegant home. He had a large library that included works in Latin and Greek, and he was highly regarded in his community for his fine character, hospitality and benevolence, and his energy in business, and he was considered a great reader and scholar. For twenty years he enjoyed the bounty of his comfortable life. He was elected repeatedly to minor town offices of public trust.

When the trouble which preceded the Revolution began to increase, the confidence of his fellow townsmen was withheld from Mr. Marston. Nevertheless, he was still elected Town Moderator, but he was not put on any important committees. He was known to be an uncompromizing adherent of the British government in the colonies. He was for a long time, however, unmolested by the Patriots as he did not openly try to interfere with them. He did, however, begin to dispose of some of his real estate, as though sensing what would happen.

In 1774 he signed a letter, along with over 200 other merchants, lawyers, and prominent citizens, expressing support for the royal Governor Hutchinson, which offended many of his townspeople. People began to treat him rudely. In 1775 a Marblehead committee came to his house, broke open his doors, entered his desks and stole money and notes, and carried off his account books. He made his escape from town with difficulty and seems to have hidden with friends near Boston.

In 1776 he came here to Saint John, and later the same year he appeared in Windsor, Nova Scotia, afterwards going to Halifax. He there engaged in trade, sometimes in the Miramichi; he went to sea, was taken prisoner and carried off to Massachusetts. A letter survives which he wrote in 1777 in Boston, as he says "in duress." He was exchanged and returned to Halifax. In 1787 he visited friends in Massachusetts, and then went to London.

Several letters and poems of Mr. Marston's were published in the New England Historical and Genealogical Register of October 1873, together with an account of Mr. Marston's life, and a genealogy of the Marston family. His poetry, and prose, make reference to his distressful situation, yet clearly show the great culture, fine breeding and winning sense of humor of this gentleman, even in such difficult circumstances. In a poem written while detained in Boston and addressed to his brother-in-law in Plymouth, Massachusetts, Mr. Marston wrote:

"These few lines come to let you know
That I am well - hope you are so.
(From this true style epistolary,
All good writers ne'er should vary.)
Also to give you information
Of my present situation;
Quite unlike yours, who, now at ease,
Can ramble wheresoe'er you please,

And being now so left i' the lurch,
I cannot even go to church.

And yet it would some comfort be,
If I could but an old friend see,
With whom to sit a while and chatter
Of this and that and other matter:

In a letter to his sister in 1782, Marston writes, "Dangers escaped and Hardships gone thro afford a pleasure on recollection . . . For my part I enjoy uninterrupted good health. The Hardships I have suffered have done it no harm. Neither have the misfortunes which have befallen me . . ." He closed with this sad but simple wish, that must bring a tear to the meanest eye as we read of this fine gentleman reduced to the status of a vagabond in his times: . . . "accept the only mark of my Friendship which I can now bestow," he wrote, "My most cordial & sincere wish for every thing that is good for you and yours . . ."

He seems to have been in Europe, yet it is evident that he was destitute. However, he never solicited or received any relief from the British government. His main course of income seems to have been money received from relatives in Massachusetts who settled up his outstanding accounts for him, and sold off his possessions a few at a time. Since his account books had been stolen, Mr. Marston had to rely on his memory of who owed him money. Mr. Marston's mother, it is interesting to mention in passing, was a Winslow of the famous Plymouth family, and he had inherited items brought to New England on the "Mayflower." He was careful that these were not sold, and they have come down in the families of his descendants.

Though the Loyalists were staunch supporters of British government in the colonies, it seems likely that they cherished the stability it provided and feared most the uncertainty of another form of rule. That they were sincerely devoted to the rule of the Crown, and not, for the most part, mere Romanticists, can be seen most clearly in the straightforward words of Benjamin Marston. "I am sincerely tired of England," he wrote, "but how to get out of it is the question . . ." Evidently, any initial enchantment with Old England soon gave way to a nostalgia for the old homes in New England.

An opportunity for Mr. Marston to "get out of" England, as he put it, soon appeared. He was asked to go out as a land surveyor with a large company who were about to make a settlement on the island of Bulama on the coast of Africa. He was offered £ 60 per annum, plus his board, and 500 acres of land there. These terms were low enough for a man of his former position, yet he characteristically looked on the bright side saying he believed that, with industry, the lands would soon be very valuable because sugar cane, cotton and coffee could be grown there.

That he was excited about going there, and optimistic about the future, is clear from a letter to his sister which sounds rather like the glowing reports carried back to Europe by adventurers in North America some three centuries earlier. "Rice is produced twice a year," he wrote, "Indian corn flourishes exceedingly, - so that I shall once more enjoy the luxury of roasting ears & boiled corn & beans, - Yams, - sweet potatoes, - all the Tropical fruits, - with poultry & all kinds of Game without number."

He goes on to say that he would rather be embarking on this fabulous adventure than working at a regular job in England, for he was tired of living there. Of course, one imagines that the corollary to this statement is that he would rather be living back in Marblehead. How his life had changed ! One can only feel great pity for this tragic soul in exile.

A glimpse of the man's inner conviction can be seen in this, from the same letter to his sister, and must be the core of the very being of most of the Loyalists:

" I don't mean by this to pay any compliment to the first instigators of our American Revolution. Although it has eventually been of such advantage to Mankind, I should as soon think of erecting monuments to Judas Iscariot, Pontius Pilate, & the Jewish Sanhedrim for betraying and crucifying the LORD of Life, because that event was so importantly & universally beneficial. I am glad my dear Sister, to find you have so much Faith, Patience & good Sense, as to bear your adverse fortune with so much equanimity, & don't think yourself wretched, tho you have been Stripped of your property. Misfortunes cease to be so when we use them as opportunities of exercising Patience, Fortitude & ready Submission to the will of Providence. And 'tis wonderful how soon we acquire the habits of those Virtues, if we have but the good Sense to find out how many Things we can do without."

Mr. Marston went to Bulama. All was not so rosy as he had envisioned. The natives were treacherous; it rained constantly, causing fevers and disease. The few who survived the first months abandoned the island. It was from the account of one of them that Mr. Marston's friends learned that he had died on Bulama of the African fever soon after he arrived there. One of the company recorded the event, and said of him, "I never heard this good man rail at, or say hard things of that country by which he had been so ill treated; he bore all patiently . . . happy in having known such a man, I felt it a duty to endeavour to record his virtues. Should this Journal, by any accident, ever reach Marblehead, it may be a consolation to some of his friends and family to know what became of him; at the same time to know, if he did not die a rich man, he died a good man . . ."

Like so many others, Benjamin Marston had made a careful, deliberate decision which changed the course of his life forever. From no personal considerations, rather than from a deep conviction of duty and a clear sense of loyalty to the British Crown, he gave up everything that was dear to him - his "pleasant and spacious dwelling house" in Marblehead, with its "fine old garden for morning exercise;" his cherished library; his well-earned reputation as a merchant, magistrate and citizen; his relatives, friends, and native country, and became a refugee, a wanderer on the face of the earth. This, ladies and gentlemen, succinctly captures the spirit of the Loyalists we are here in Saint John to honor and remember today.

I wish to thank you for listening and to thank the organizers of this program for extending to me the privilege of attending and speaking to you. I would like to close with a cordial and sincere invitation to everyone who may be interested in researching the genealogy of the families of New England Loyalists, and pre-Loyalists, to consider using our fine library at the New England Historic Genealogical Society in Boston. We have the largest collection of printed material on New England families in the world; a rich and unduplicated manuscript collection at the disposal of members of the Society; and an impressive library of printed British parish registers, indexes, periodicals and published records of every kind, as well as a copy of the most recent Church of Latter-day Saints International Genealogical Index on microfiche. We are closed Mondays, but open Saturdays (except for holiday weekends), and would be happy to have you come any time.

Thank you.
